CHANGES BY DALE GRISSON

Children growing up in the 30's and 40's were not exposed to many of the evils that our young people face daily. They never heard of people living together outside of wedlock.

They were not taught that fornication and adultery were normal life styles, or that homosexuality was an acceptable "alternative" lifestyle.

Now many young people, many of them children, who have not yet reached their teenage years, have drug and alcohol problems.

It is not unusual to hear or read of children who have been killed by another child. Not only are the lives of these children ruined by the terrible things they have done, but the consequences of their actions live on.

Prior to World War II most families lived on farms. The husband worked to support the family, and the mother stayed home and raised the children.

Together they made the decisions that affected their family. Children growing up in that time lived entirely different lifestyles from those of today.

Most were kept busy working in the fields, doing chores around the farm, going to school, attending church, and engaging in activities that lent peace and contentment to their lives.

Homes were stable; few one-parent homes existed, and those that did were generally as a result of death. Divorce was rare and shocking to the community.

Following World War II changes began to take place in the behavior of our society. People got caught up in a rush to obtain material things, as if treasure on earth had become their god.

Both parents began working outside the home just to make ends meet, and nerves became stretched to the breaking point from trying to keep up.

Children began arriving from school to houses where no one was home. And we wonder what's happened to our families and to our nation.

We are shocked at the decline of the morals and values in our society. Even the church is undergoing changes and facing issues we would never have dreamed of a few years ago.

God would not have it be thus; He has given all we need. Only by trusting in Him, studying and obeying His word, and putting His principles into practice will we find true contentment in this life.
